The physiology of hemorrhoids is quite different from how it is popularly recognized by the populace. Physiologically speaking, it is a mass of tissue that serves as a supporting device in stool control. It is also referred to as a cushion like clump that is full of connective tissue, veins, and arteries that is great for allowing stool to pass through the anal canal smoothly. The hemorrhoid support also aids in protecting the muscles of the anal sphincter from damage as the stool passes by during bowel excretion. As it has a steady supply of blood direct from the arteries, one of the most common symptoms of an abnormality in the hemorrhoidal cushions is bright red bleeding. There are two classifications of this abnormal condition: internal and external.

You are not suffering from swollen hemorrhoidal cushions, be it internal or external, it would really be best to keep yourself that way by doing some minor changes in order to your diet. This entails eating more food that are rich in fiber, drinking your eight full glasses of water every day (more if you can deal with it), giving yourself adequate rest. You would also need to stay away a little bit from activities that put too much pressure on the abdomen.

Piles can be Brought about by a Variety of Different Things

One of the most critical things is your diet. Without having enough fiber in your diet, this is one of the main causes. Chronic straining during a bowel movement can also bring about hemorrhoids. Pregnancy is another prevailing cause.

Internal hemorrhoids are dangerous because this can lead to a gangrenous condition wherein blood vessels die from the loss of blood supply due to spasms of the anal sphincter. In this case, immediate medical attention is actually recommended and surgery may become necessary. Some of the signs that there is an internal swelling on the cushions include the secretion of mucus in the rectal area and an unusual moistening of the anus and the skin that surrounds it. This dampness often leads to irritation, pain during bowel movements, rectal bleeding, stool that is wrapped in bright red arterial blood, or blood sticking to the toilet paper or on the toilet bowl.

External Hemorrhoids Have More Definite Signs

You would immediately know that you have this condition if you feel a lump that protrudes from your anus. And in contrast to the internal swelling of the hemorrhoidal cushions, the external lumps often do not result in hemorrhaging and exhibit none of the symptoms of the particular internal condition. However, there is also an underlying danger to this condition: thrombosis or the clotting of blood in the circulation system of a vein or artery. Because the hemorrhoidal cushion remains filled with veins and arteries, there is still a possibility of the occurrence of thrombus. This would also require the attention of a medical professional.

Have Found that the Creams that You Get from the Local Pharmacy Don't Really Help Much

I'm sure that you have experienced the same thing and that's why you might be here now. I have found that when I take a lot more fiber my hemorrhoids go away. Most doctors recommend this as well. You should take some sort of fiber supplement each day. This is probably the most popular piles treatment.
