The first option you have to find some relief from your symptoms is the method most people with this problem use, topical treatments. Topical treatments are simply products such as creams and ointments that you simply apply to the affected areas and usually the burning and irritation you usually experience will begin to disappear, that is if the product works well. How do you know if the product on the shelf is going to work well? This too is essential to know.

To figure out the likelihood of certain products working for or against you, you need to begin to do your homework. Go on the internet and explore the many websites which promote hemorrhoid treatment products and start to look at some of the reviews for these products. If there are a large number of favorable reviews from people who are not being paid or pushed in any way to be able to approve the product, then it could be something you will want to look into. If a majority of the testimonials for a certain product don't look that good, you probably don't want to waste your time and money on it. It's important to use your scarce resources (time and money) wisely, which is why researching before you buy any single item will be so useful to you. The worst thing would be to keep using a product that won't offer you almost any results but you keep trying it anyway, thinking it will eventually work which may not be the case.
